

Dearest Kermit,

I hope this letter finds you well, and I write to you with the utmost respect, as your television presence has filled my five-year-old daughter, Mollie, with joy and laughter during perhaps her last days on this beautiful earth. Your uplifting performances have certainly gotten Mollie through her toughest days of treatment; you are the reason my daughter maintains the smile on her face despite the obstacles she faces each day.

Currently, Mollie is admitted in Children's National Medical Center in Washington DC, one of the best in the country. Her room is such a bleak, dark space, but Mollie's positive attitude brightens up the whole hospital. I wish we could keep that light of hers forever.

The doctors have reported that my dear Mollie is approaching her end quickly. We have tried all sorts of treatments -- chemotherapy, radiation therapy, stem cell transplant -- but all have failed after a few short weeks of euphoria. All we can do now is make her last days abundant with love and bliss. The worst feeling for a parent is to outlive your child, so it breaks my heart that she'll never write her first words or read her first book. She'll never have the chance to experience the world, to fall in love, to have the life she deserves...

Mollie was diagnosed with Leukemia last October. Despite our best efforts, her health has declined rapidly over the past few months. One week ago, we were given the heartbreaking news that Mollie is terminally ill with just one month remaining.

Mollie has always wanted to meet you in person. We promised her that we would find a way for her 10th birthday, but even in the most hopeful of miracles, that is too late. As each hour passes, we try to comfort her best we can, but she is so positive, so radiant, that it pains me that the dreaded day will soon come.

So I have a request for you, much more like a plea: could you fulfill Mollie's wish and come visit her? Her previous treatments have been so expensive, not to mention the cost it took to get her admitted to such a hospital. As teachers, my husband and I are now painfully in debt, otherwise we would definitely cover the cost of your ticket. Seeing that you are quite the busy frog, you can transfer us the money and we can book you the trip here so you don't have to go through all the trouble. A single donation of $2500 would cover all the costs necessary for you to meet our Mollie.

Enclosed within this letter is Mollie's hospital admission form as proof of her condition.

Your work is something that I will always respect, as it is a constant reminder of my daughter's uplifting spirit that persists despite the obstacles in her way. While it saddens me that she will never have a regular childhood, I hope that I can make her final days memorable with your help. I urge you to consider my offer, and I await your response. May God bless you; have a nice day.

Sincerely,
Heather Williams
